

The Association of American Law Schools (AALS) and the National Law Journal present
Blogging, Scholarship, and the Bench and Bar
Hosted by Santa Clara Law's High Tech Law Institute and Center for Social Justice and Public Service

September 17, 2007
10:30am-12pm PST
Wiegand Room, Arts & Sciences Building, Santa Clara University

Law professors have increasingly turned to blogs and other electronic media to engage current legal issues. Law schools must evaluate if the work of these "blawgers" should weigh comparably with traditional hard copy scholarship. Does this form of writing present challenges to credibility or does its timeliness make it particularly useful?

In this on-line and live panel, several blawgers, a federal judge, and a practicing lawyer engage the issues presented by the proliferation of electronic discussions of the law.

Panelists

- * Honorable Marsha L. Berzon, Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals
- * Paul Butler, George Washington University Law School and blogger at Blackprof.com
- * Cindy Cohn, Electronic Frontier Foundation
- * Eric Goldman, Santa Clara Law School and blogger at the Technology & Marketing Law Blog
- * Lawrence B. Solum, University of Illinois College of Law and blogger at the Legal Theory Blog

Discussion Facilitators

- * Nancy H. Rogers, Dean, The Ohio State University Michael E. Moritz College of Law, and President, Association of American Law Schools
- * Leigh Jones, reporter, National Law Journal
