

Xavier Jaravel
Postdoctoral Fellow
Stanford University

Xavier is an applied microeconomist working on topics of relevance for macroeconomics, with a particular interest in innovation policy. He holds a PhD in economics from Harvard University. His recent research examines the social and economic processes that generate innovation and distribute its rewards in society, in the context of the United States over the past twenty years.